

Artist Statement

Jason Messinger's artwork straddles the cool allure of pure abstraction and the hot recognition of representation. He explores the fuzzy borders between representation and abstraction, identity and design, meaning and beauty. The artist is best known for his ceramic tile murals – often with symbolic imagery that tease the viewer into becoming complicit in their meaning, and for his ceramic sculptures – which are abstract in shape but have a figurative sensibility.

The artist approaches tile with a painter's concerns and a sculptor's experience. The idea of abstraction on the edge of identification permeates the work. Images often hint at language, symbol, map, comic strip, or hieroglyph; but often only hint, as the symbols remain undefined, transitional. His multi-tile works are modular, allowing any configuration and sequence of the tiles. The murals exhibit a circular narrative, open-ended to interpretation. The viewer becomes complicit in constructing the meaning. Mounting systems allows one to easily change the position of the tiles, and thus reset the 'narrative'.

The artist's sculptures are solidly present while expressly fluid. They change appearance with the viewers' perspective, transforming in shape and direction. Each face of the work functions like movements of a dance, with unexpected turns. Different perspectives on the work converse with each other, creating a circular narrative of motion and stillness, form and emotion.

His paintings and drawings in ink, pastel, and watercolor, re-imagine the world into patterns and diagrams of movement and color, light and gesture. Giclee's of his artwork, as well as artist-designed gift items, are all available on-line with links through his main web site.

In addition, Jason Messinger is an author of fiction, poetry, art reviews, and satire. His work can be read on his several Blogs, and his books and collections can be purchased on-line in print and e-format editions in such outlets as Amazon and Lulu. Jason Messinger also curates art shows of regional artists in both physical and on-line galleries.

Jason Messinger: It's A Wild Thing - solo show catalog excerpt

"Wassily Kandinsky is commonly considered to be the first artist to create purely abstract work. This is, of course, a Western notion, ignoring the abstract patterns traditionally found in carpets, tiles and architectural embellishments of religious works in the Islamic world. Dating back to the seventh century, in the Muslim world, the concept of representation, of attempting to reproduce an image of the natural world was tantamount to heresy, a mocking of God, who was considered to be the only true maker of life or lifelike forms. Fundamentally, this absence of recognizable imagery relates to the Qur'an's condemnation of idols or idolatry. The written word, calligraphy, played an important role in their religious art, combining literary and visual information. Jason Messinger's 'Metropolis' echoes many of these precepts of abstraction. There is a hint, a suggestion, of text running through a contradictory narrative, at once beautifully simple and puzzlingly complex. In reference to his work, Messinger speaks of abstraction on the edge of representation, a fuzzy borderline. On one level, reading this large work is akin to attempting to decipher ancient and mysterious hieroglyphs, symbols of meaning. But this route of understanding is eventually debased, as the images are actually undefined, not based in any known language. Instead, the work creates its own language, an enigmatic structure of non-linear thought. The non-linear aspect of the tile works is emphasized by the fact that they may be arranged and rearranged in a multitude of variations, the modular nature of the work allows it to be horizontal or vertical, re-ordering the sequence of the individual pieces. In the Western world, we are accustomed to reading from left to right, and this cultural constraint pervades the ordered manner in which we view art. In a large horizontal work, we look from left to right. Essentially, Messinger turns this tradition around in a circular fashion, forcing a new way of reading. Although the tile works are based on a grid pattern, paradoxically, rather than following a rigid linear sequence, the eye tends to dance around the composition. Instead of a still pattern of regimentation, there is a choreography of creation on the part of the viewer. This liberation of interpretation, the freedom of the viewer to rearrange the order of objects in the mind's eye, or even to actually physically alter the installation order is paramount to understanding Messinger's method, his desire, to include the viewer in the creative process of his work. Kandinsky often based his work on music, frequently naming his paintings after musical movements. This notion of movement runs throughout Messinger's work. His sculptures, such as 'Fame', reflect the dynamism of Italian Futurism, such as Boccioni's 'Continuity of a Figure in Space', the attempted depiction of movement encapsulated in a still figure. This combination of elements, of a physical static figure embodying an emotional suggestion of kinetics, itself creates a dynamic tension. These sculptures are not self-contained. It is as if there is a body, an energy, expressively trying to get out. Rodin's famous sculpture of Balzac embodies just such a dynamic energy, the strength of Balzac's character being barely contained in his cloaked enclosure. Yet, both Boccioni and Rodin are using figurative references to the human body. Somehow Messinger manages to portray this energy, this vibrant motion without any allusions to natural form. Again, in these sculptures, Jason Messinger has invented a language that magically provokes our reading of the work. These works suggest the form of a cat in a bag; yet, the artist never lets the cat out of the bag, leaving us somewhat mystified. Conceptually, this confusion leads to a creative act on the part of the viewer. In our bemusement we are led to continually rethinking the inner nature of the work. The notion of sculpture forming a duality between the container and the thing contained is manifested. The idea of motion is also embodied in the way that the three-dimensional works demand us to traverse through time, circling each piece in an attempt to gather a visual capsule of the whole. The multiple views of Thunder reproduced in this brochure present but a few angles of view, but still present the radical ever-changing personality of a single work. Rather than being self-contained, Thunder is a chimera, changing and shifting dramatically, it evades any attempt to have a singular memory of its being. The very evasiveness of this work, echoing our inability to capture it in a simple cage in our mind, is the core of its beauty. It's a wild thing."
